R v Jones and Smith [1976]

D stole two televisions from his father's house, which he had general permission to enter. He had left home but was allowed to visit.

Held: D was a trespasser if he entered premises knowing that or being reckless whether he was entering in excess of any permission that had been given to him to enter.

R v Walkington [1979]

D went behind a counter in a large store and opened a till drawer. The counter was movable, but occupied a clearly identified area. It was empty so he slammed it shut. D was convicted for burglary. D claimed he did not realise that he was not allowed to go behind the counter and therefore had not entered as a trespasser.

Held: it is for the jury to decide whether the area physically marked out by a counter was sufficiently segregated to amount to a "part of a building" from which the general public are excluded. It was clear that the public was impliedly prohibited from entering the counter area and D knew this.

R v Ryan [1996]

D burgled a house but only got as far as being trapped by his neck with only his head and right arm inside a window. He was not in a position to steal.

Held: D need not have got so far into the building as to be able to accomplish his unlawful purpose.
