I work as a secretary at a wool factory. I have a very busy day. I am responsible for many things in the office. Every day I have to prepare different documents, answer letters and work with customers. The work is interesting but it requires much patience. In the afternoon at half past twelve I have a break for lunch. I usually go to the coffee shop opposite the factory. I order a main course and a dessert. I prefer going with my colleague, Lamia. She is the head of the financial department and she is good at calculations.

Last week we attended a conference about the history of wool. The wonderful story of wool began when primitive people started covering themselves in the woolly skins of the wild sheep that hunters killed for food. In using sheepskins, early tribes discovered a strong material which gave them protection from heat and cold, from wind and rain. Sheep then began to be kept for their milk, meat and valuable wool. There are nearly one thousand million sheep in the world. They are able to survive in a range of climates and are easy to care for.
