SOURCE 1SOURCE 2:*Song lyrics

Globalisation
 World without walls
 Being connected through technology
 We're loving it.

Traditions disappearing
 Food to take away
 Local currency dying
 All wearing the same.

Globalisation
 World without walls
 We're living it.

Loss of culture, all the same
 Where are our traditions?
 What about our language?

Sweatshops, cheap labour and pollution

Globalisation
 World without walls.
 We're hating it.

SOURCE 3:Letter to a magazine

I have been thinking about which university I should go to and have decided on two that do the course I want to do. One is the university in my home town and the second is a university overseas, and I am really not sure which one I want to go to. I have discussed it with my parents and they say I should choose the one I think would be best for me in the future. I know a lot about the university in my home town but maybe I need more information to help me decide about the university overseas. The only thing I do know is how much the fees will be at both universities and that if I choose the local university I can live at home. What advice would you give me?

SOURCE 4:Radio phone-in on culture

Radio Presenter: On this week's show we are talking about the role of culture in a globalised world and we are interested in your stories. First let's hear from Costas.

Costas: One of the most important traditions in my family is a traditional Orthodox Greek wedding. The trouble is my fiancée is Sikh and her parents are insisting on a traditional Sikh wedding like the one they had. As she's an only daughter, and I want to please both families, this is becoming a real issue.

Juanita: It is hard when you live in a society with different ethnic cultures and want to keep your own culture as people generally think you are prejudiced against other cultures. This is just not true. You want to share your culture with others so that they can experience the food, traditions, music and art that you love so much. If we do not share our cultures, they will disappear.

Kristina: But that is just the point! No one wants to experience different cultures. Most people are not prepared to try different foods or celebrate other people's traditions. Anyway, granddad is always telling us that tradition has been replaced by mobile phones, designer clothes and cars in every country.
