Paper 2147/12
Paper 12

Key messages

Successful responses are dependent upon candidates reading the questions carefully before they begin, in order to understand exactly what is being asked, and to give themselves the opportunity to write focused and balanced responses. Any given dates in the question should be carefully noted to help ensure that responses only include relevant details.

In essay-type responses it is a good idea for candidates to practice writing evaluative, rather than purely summative, conclusions in which they make a judgement and justify this by reference to the balance of evidence cited in their essay.

Successful responses were characterised by the inclusion of relevant, contextual examples.

General comments

Successful responses were able to demonstrate good factual knowledge and understanding of both the Core and Depth Study questions. These responses included clear and accurate communication of ideas, whether explaining the reasons for past events and historical features or building an argument to reach a balanced historical judgement. Less successful responses, whilst often demonstrating sound factual knowledge, found it difficult to apply the knowledge to the question set. These responses tended to be characterised by a descriptive list of facts with no explanation.

It was pleasing to see that there were very few rubric errors and most candidates had used the time allocated effectively and completed the paper.

Candidates need to be aware of the specific demands of each type of question:

Part (a) responses should focus on description and only include relevant details. Explanation is not required. Most candidates now realise that answers to (a) questions can be short and concise and that there is no need to include background information.

Part (b) responses require facts and explanation. Candidates must be selective of the factual knowledge needed to explain events and write in continuous prose rather than using a 'listing' approach. Most (b) questions ask 'Why' a particular event happened, so it is important that candidates direct their response to address the reasons, rather than provide a description of what happened. Successful responses were carefully organised, usually using separate paragraphs for the different reasons that are being explained. Narrative or long introductions which 'set the scene' are not required.

Part (c) requires facts, explanation and analysis. The most effective responses argue both for and against the focus of the question and reach a balanced judgement. When a question asks, 'Are you surprised a particular event happened?' it is important to include explanations on both sides of the argument. A valid conclusion should go beyond being a summary of what has already been stated by addressing, 'how far' or 'how successful'. Weaker responses often focused only on one side of the argument. These could be improved by including more contextual examples on both sides of the argument to produce a balanced response.

Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4

There were too few responses to these questions for meaningful comments to be made.

Questions 5 and 6

These were the two most popular questions in this section.

Question 5

- (a) This question was very well answered. The best responses demonstrated a detailed knowledge of how the Assembly and the Council of the League were meant to work and included a number of relevant, concisely expressed points. Points made included: 'the Assembly met once a year', 'one of the Assembly's roles was to set the budget', 'the Council consisted of four permanent members', 'the Council could issue sanctions'. Other responses did not include details on both the Assembly and the Council. Less successful responses did not distinguish between the Assembly and the Council and described the activities together. Some responses strayed away from the question and wrote at length generally on the setting up of the League of Nations, which lacked relevance to this question.
- (b) There were mixed responses to this question. The most effective were familiar with the events leading up to Mussolini's bombing of Corfu and the subsequent response of the League, and provided two explanations as to why the League's failure was important. They explained that the League appeared weak because Mussolini ignored the League's instructions and insisted that the demands for Greek compensation should be dealt with by the Conference of Ambassadors, which found in favour of Mussolini's demands. A second reason often explained was that the Corfu crisis showed that powerful countries, such as Italy, could just ignore the League of Nations. This would be a lesson for other powerful countries, such as Germany and Japan, in the future when they were attempting to acquire territory. Less successful responses identified reasons without any explanation, or with minimal reference to the Corfu incident, such as, 'its failure was important because it showed the weakness of the League' and 'this was important as it showed that powerful countries could ignore the League'. A small number of responses demonstrated no accurate knowledge of the Corfu crisis, often confusing the events and the countries involved.
- (c) This question was well answered. There were a number of well-developed and balanced responses which discussed the extent to which the lack of an army explained the League's failure in the 1930s. Strong responses identified the problems caused by the lack of the League's own army, especially when moral and economic sanctions failed, and went on to explain where such an army could have been used such as in Manchuria or Abyssinia. These responses then explained other reasons for the failure of the League of Nations. The most common reason identified and explained was the lack of major powers such as the USA. This had an impact on the imposition of economic sanctions, candidates most often citing the Abyssinian crisis as an example whereby the USA, not being in the League, continued trading with Abyssinia, rendering the economic sanctions ineffective. Other reasons identified included British and French self-interest, and this was often explained using aspects of the Manchurian or Abyssinian crises to demonstrate this. Weaker responses included irrelevant details of why the USA did not join the League and/or wrote detailed descriptions of the Manchurian and Abyssinian crises without highlighting how the response of the League led to its failure. A few responses included events in the 1920s such as Corfu and Vilna which were not relevant to this question.

Question 6

- (a) This question worked well for most candidates who had a good understanding of what happened in the Saar in 1935. Successful responses tended to include four precise and relevant pieces of information, for example: a scheduled plebiscite was held, identifying two of the choices available to those who voted (most were unaware of the option to remain as a League mandate) and knowing the outcome. Some left out the options and simply gave the result. Weaker responses were characterised by a lack of factual knowledge, often confusing the Saar with the Rhineland and describing how German troops marched into the area.

- (b) There were many strong responses which contained two explanations as to why the Anschluss was important to Hitler. The most common reasons identified were Hitler's own Austrian origins and his determination to overthrow the Treaty of Versailles. Candidates then went on to develop and explain these themes by linking them to Hitler's determination to create a Greater Germany and to strengthen German military resources, including manpower. Successful responses also included how the Anschluss would improve Hitler's more immediate ambitions regarding Czechoslovakia and confirmed his improved relationship with Mussolini's Italy. Weaker responses were often confused. For example, there was confusion between Hitler's aim for a Greater Germany and Hitler's quest for Lebensraum (which did not apply to Austrian territory). Some responses had no understanding of the term, 'Anschluss'.
- (c) There were mixed responses to this question. Successful responses included contextual examples to produce a well-balanced answer explaining surprise and alternatively, not surprised, that Britain and France declared war on Germany in September 1939. Candidates were strongest on appeasement as a reason to be surprised. The rationale behind appeasement was well explained, with Anglo-French non action over the remilitarisation of the Rhineland and Anschluss, as well as the 1935 Anglo-German naval agreement, frequently cited and explained. Appeasement was also well used on the other side of the argument to indicate that that the patience of Britain and France with Hitler ran out after the occupation of the rest of Czechoslovakia in March 1939 and in effect that the warning to Hitler over Poland after that could not have been clearer. The lack of British and French preparedness for war, though cited as a reason not to be surprised, was often identified, but less well explained, with many candidates arguing that both these countries were still recovering from the impact of the First World War (rather than the Great Depression), as was more accurately the case in the 1930s. Weaker responses tended to be superficial on much of the detail. They commonly identified appeasement as a reason why they were surprised but did not provide any contextual examples to support their supposition. These responses needed to include supporting examples such as: 'they were following a policy of appeasement and had let Hitler break the Treaty of Versailles by rearming Germany, remilitarising the Rhineland, achieving Anschluss and agreeing at the Munich Conference for the Sudetenland to be taken over. They took no action when he invaded Czechoslovakia in March 1939, therefore it is difficult to see how Hitler's invasion of Poland was any different, and so it is a surprise that they declared war on Germany in September 1939.' Weaker responses also tended to include a narrative of events leading to the outbreak of war in 1939 with no expression of surprised/not surprised.

Question 7

- (a) This question was very well answered and most candidates very high marks. They demonstrated a detailed knowledge of the tactics used by the Vietcong. Points made included: they used guerrilla warfare, which often involved a network of tunnels for escape and surprise attacks. They blended in with the peasants and used booby traps. Other relevant tactics most commonly cited were the use of the Ho Chi Minh Trail, they retreated when the Americans attacked so that the Americans could not fight a conventional battle, and the use of ambushes.
- (b) Strong responses demonstrated a good understanding of why the Tet Offensive was important for the USA and explained two reasons. The two most common reasons identified were that it showed the American people that North Vietnam was very far from being defeated and it led to the US seeking negotiations to end the war with North Vietnam. The first identification was explained by developing the idea that it was important for the USA because of the impact it had on the American people. Tet was a massive attack by North Vietnamese forces across South Vietnam in 1968. Despite being a military defeat for North Vietnam it caused a big shock in America. They even attacked the American Embassy in Saigon. The Americans had been told that North Vietnam was weak and incapable of launching large attacks. Tet showed that this was incorrect and support for the war in America declined and the opposition increased. Prior to this media coverage had been generally positive but, as a result of Tet, public opinion changed and there were several peace marches to end the war. Weaker responses usually readily identified reasons, but these needed to be fully developed into explanations. There was a minority of candidates who had no knowledge of the Tet Offensive and offered no response.
- (c) There were mixed responses to this question. To achieve high marks candidates needed to produce a well-balanced answer to explain which was more important for the USA, its involvement in Korea or in the Cuban Missile Crisis. Successful responses showed good understanding of the events in Korea and identified that US involvement was important to stop the spread of communism. This was explained by adding, as troops from North Korea invaded South Korea and were supported by both China and the USSR, that there was a real danger that South Korea would fall to the communists. This would have been an important step in spreading communism to other countries in Southeast Asia. On the other side of the argument, candidates identified and explained that US involvement in Cuba was vital to stop a potential nuclear war. This is because Cuba was a communist country off the coast of the USA and the USSR missiles which were placed there were a real threat to the USA. Some responses were one sided; candidates tended to be more familiar with events in Cuba than with those in Korea. Weaker responses included much narrative on the background to the Cuban Missile Crisis, including the overthrow of Batista and the Bay of Pigs failure for the USA, which were not relevant to this question. These responses also often included detailed description of the Cuban Missile Crisis without stressing why it was important for the USA.

Question 8

- (a) This question worked well for most candidates who had a good understanding of the Soviet Union's response to the uprising in Hungary in 1956. They expressed a number of concise and relevant points, including: Soviet tanks and troops moved into Budapest, fierce fighting followed and 3,000 Hungarian civilians were killed. Nagy and his supporters were executed. Other responses wrote about why the Soviet Union responded in this way which was not the focus of the question.
- (b) This question was well answered. Strong responses were characterised by the explanation of two reasons why it was important for the Soviet Union to stop Dubcek's reform programme in Czechoslovakia. The most common reason explained was that the Soviets were afraid that Dubcek's ideas would spread to other Communist countries in Eastern Europe. His reforms included a free press, freedom of speech and reducing government control over industry. If these reforms were allowed in Czechoslovakia there was a worry that people in other communist countries would demand the same freedoms. Other factors identified and explained included the fact that the USSR would look weak if they did not take decisive action and they were worried this would weaken the Communist Bloc in the Cold War against the USA. Weaker responses shifted the focus of the question and described Dubcek's reforms, rather than emphasising why it was important for the Soviet Union to stop them.
- (c) There were mixed responses to this question. Strong responses explained surprise that Gorbachev made little effort to defend Soviet power in Eastern Europe. This was because previous Soviet leaders had seen Eastern European countries as a protective barrier for the Soviet Union against the West. The Soviet Union had been invaded by Germany twice in the twentieth century and Stalin had been determined that this would not happen again. This had been the basis of foreign policy for decades and explains why the Soviet Union had put down risings in Hungary and Czechoslovakia. As a result of previous events, it is very surprising that when communist regimes began to collapse and the Berlin Wall fell, that Gorbachev did nothing. These responses often also expressed surprise, because The Brezhnev Doctrine had said that the Soviet Union would intervene. Such responses produced a balanced answer by then explaining why they were not surprised, most commonly expressing the fact that Gorbachev was a new type of leader in the Soviet Union who realised that the Soviet Union was in economic trouble and spending too much on arms in the unwinnable war in Afghanistan. He believed in different policies such as Glasnost and Perestroika. Less successful responses were characterised by a narrative of Gorbachev's reforms, with no reference to surprised/not surprised. It is important that candidates link the points that they make to the question.

Section B: Depth Studies

Questions 9 and 10

There were too few responses to these questions for meaningful comments to be made.

Question 11

This was the most popular question of the Depth Studies

- (a) The majority of candidates knew that Hitler took advantage of the Reichstag Fire by blaming the communists, which then gave him an excuse to arrest them. Successful responses had a good understanding of other immediate consequences, including how he was able to convince President

Hindenburg that communists were plotting to overthrow the Government so that he would issue an emergency decree, thus he took advantage of the Reichstag Fire to consolidate his power. A common misconception was that after the Reichstag Fire he immediately passed The Enabling Act.

- (b) There were mixed responses to this question. The majority of candidates could identify reasons why the Depression was important to the Nazis, most commonly that the Nazis gained support because the Weimar Republic did not deal well with the effects of the Depression and the Nazis were able to win support by offering full employment. Successful responses developed such points into an explanation. They explained that, as a result of the Depression, millions of Germans had lost their jobs. This gave the Nazis the opportunity to do well in elections as they expressed contempt for Weimar's democratic system and said that it was unable to solve Germany's economic problems caused by the Depression. The Nazis organised soup kitchens and provided shelter in hostels for the unemployed. They promised them work, freedom and bread. This gave them lots of votes and they became the largest party in the Reichstag in the elections of July 1932. Less successful responses included generalisations as to how the Depression was important to the Nazis and how it enabled them to exploit the situation but did not say how, and also the points made were often not linked to the Depression. A small number of responses discussed the hyperinflation crisis of 1923 which was not relevant to this question.
- (c) This question was well-answered. Candidates showed a very good understanding of the effects of the Munich Putsch and produced some good responses, with detailed arguments on either side of the debate. The majority of candidates began their responses agreeing with the hypothesis by using the events of the Munich Putsch to explain that in the short term it was a failure. Most commonly included were that it was not well planned, failed to win popular support, was defeated quickly, Hitler was later arrested and imprisoned and the Nazi Party was banned. Successful responses then examined the other side of the debate, including the long-term effects of the Munich Putsch. A common explanation was that Hitler was imprisoned in Landsberg Castle and whilst there he had time to re-think his tactics. He realised that he could not gain power by uprisings and violence and that he needed to win support and win elections. This made him re-organise the party and begin to use democratic methods. This was a turning point for the Nazis and contributed to their later success in elections. Weaker responses tended to be more descriptive, an example being that Hitler wrote Mein Kampf when he was in prison; the key themes were described in these responses, but little attempt was made to link it to the long-term success of the Nazis. Others were less selective in the details they included in their answers and wrote at length how the Germans gained power in 1933, with no link to the effects of the Munich Putsch.

Question 12

- (a) The majority of candidates were very familiar with how the Nazis used the mass media. Examples included: cheap radios were made available so all Germans could buy one and hear Hitler's speeches. Goebbels controlled the newspapers closely and they were not allowed to print anti-Nazi ideas. Posters were put up around Germany showing images of the ideal Aryan family. Successful responses also highlighted that the Nazis used the media to promote Nazi propaganda and to make the Nazis look great. Weaker responses mis-interpreted the focus of the question and whilst being able to identify the different types of mass media, they did not focus on how the media was used by the Nazis.
- (b) Strong responses identified and explained two reasons why Kristallnacht was important. The most common explanation was that it was a turning point in the nature of the Nazi persecution of the Jews. It was a change from the previous economic and social persecution to physical persecution, with Jews being beaten and murdered, and can be seen as a step towards the Holocaust. Other reasons explained included the increasing number of Jews leaving Germany and how Goebbels had used the event to try to improve his standing with Hitler. Less successful responses included details on why Hitler hated the Jews, which was not the focus of the question. A small number of candidates confused Kristallnacht with the Night of the Long Knives.
- (c) There were some good responses to this question which were well organised and included carefully selected and relevant details. In agreement with the hypothesis, responses explained that there was no effective opposition to the Nazi regime. They explained this in terms of the terror and force used to suppress any opposition. Control was exercised through the Gestapo, who had unlimited powers to search houses, arrest people on suspicion and send them to concentration camps without trial or explanation. Many Germans were frightened to speak out against the regime, even if they wanted to. Strong responses also gave consideration to ways in which opposition to the Nazi regime was effective. They explained how many young people believed in freedom of expression and values which conflicted with those of the Nazis. They used the Edelweiss Pirates as an example and showed how they shared a strong distaste of the strict regimentation and sexual segregation of the Hitler Youth, so they often beat them up. During the war they carried out acts of sabotage, helped army deserters and even assassinated a Gestapo chief. The activities of the Swing Movement, the White Rose group and members of the Church were also often used as examples of effective opposition. Some opposition could be used to demonstrate both sides of the debate, for example, groups like the White Rose, despite scattering leaflets and conducting an anti-Nazi graffiti campaign, were rounded up by the Gestapo and executed, thus reducing the effectiveness of the opposition. Other responses would have benefited from adopting a much less narrative approach on the effectiveness of the opposition.

Questions 13 and 14

There were too few responses to these questions for meaningful comments to be made.

Question 15

- (a) This question was well answered and candidates had a good understanding of the experiences of American farmers in the 1920s. Successful responses described the problems experienced by farmers at this time and gained very high marks as a result of identifying four points. These included: overproduction, competition from Canada, reduction in prices and the eviction of tenant farmers because they could not pay their rents.
- (b) Successful responses were characterised by explaining how a specific traditional industry struggled in the 1920s. Two explanations were needed. The main industries identified and explained were the coal and textile industry. For example: The coal industry struggled and found itself producing too much coal because demand for it was going down. This was because electricity was increasingly supplied to more homes and factories, so they were changing from coal to electricity for their energy. They were also changing to other new forms of energy, such as gas and oil. Less successful responses only provided generalised answers with no mention of specific industries, for example, the main reason why traditional industries struggled was because of changes happening in American society. This could have been improved by identifying an industry and including more details as to why it was struggling in the 1920s.
- (c) There were some very good responses to this question, which displayed an excellent knowledge and understanding of the US economy in the 1920s. These responses produced well supported arguments on both sides of the debate. Regarding the responsibility of the Republican Government for the boom, successful responses identified and explained policies related to low taxation, import tariffs, the formation of trusts and laissez-faire. The counter explanations most commonly focused on technical advances such as the assembly line and mechanisation of new industries, such as the car industry and its boost to other associate industries like rubber, oil and glass. Other examples included explanations of credit, advertising and the positive impact of World War I on the US economy. Less successful responses, whilst often demonstrating sound factual knowledge, were less selective in the details they needed to use to answer the question relevantly and often described the reasons for the boom, rather than explain their impact on the American economy.

Questions 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22

There were too few responses to these questions for meaningful comments to be made.

HISTORY

Paper 2147/13
Paper 13

Key messages

- Candidates need to read the questions very carefully to ensure that their responses are relevant. They should note the particular focus of any given question, and structure their answer accordingly.
- Dates given in a question should be noted so that only relevant material is included in responses.
- Candidates need to be aware of the specific demands of each type of question. Part (a) questions require recall and description. Part (b) questions require recall and explanation, and part (c) questions require recall, explanation and analysis.

In part (c) questions the most effective responses argue both for and against the focus of the question and they also reach a valid judgement. A valid judgement will go beyond restating what has already been written in the response by addressing 'how far', 'how important', 'how successful' or 'to what extent', depending on the question set.

General comments

Many answers reflected sound understanding and good knowledge, supported by a wealth of factual detail. Candidates expressed themselves clearly and had a great deal of information to share and they were able to put this to good use in the part (a) questions which reward recall and description. Many answered these questions in the form of a short paragraph, which was an appropriate approach.

Strong answers to part (b) and (c) questions applied knowledge precisely to what the questions were asking, rather than writing lengthy introductions which 'set the scene' or including information which was lacking in relevance. Credit was given for the identification of relevant 'why' factors but the best responses were those that went further and developed each factor fully, thereby meeting the exact demands of the question.

Many responses to part (c) questions not only tried to argue both sides of the topic (both agreeing and disagreeing with the given interpretation) but also attempted to arrive at a judgement in the conclusion. Candidates should avoid repeating points already made in the essay and should try to explain and analyse how far the argument both supports and disagrees with the focus of the question. Some conclusions just asserted 'how far', rather than explaining which side of the argument was stronger than the other.

Comments on specific questions

Section A: Core Content

Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4

There were too few responses to these questions for meaningful comments to be made.

Question 5

This was a popular question. In answer to part (a), answers included references to the League's support for Finland's claims to the Islands and details about the safeguards which were included in the judgement. Part (b) was answered well, as many candidates identified Soviet communism, the opposition from the US Congress and Germany's War Guilt as factors; explanation and development of these identified factors featured in stronger responses, for example, why did the context of Soviet communism mean that its membership would not be allowed? Many candidates showed good knowledge in part (c) of the crises the League was meant to deal with in the 1930s; valid descriptions of the Manchurian and Abyssinian crises, for example, gained credit. Better answers included explanations as to why Britain was responsible for not dealing with these events more successfully, for example the motives behind the Hoare Laval Pact and why Britain appeased Mussolini in order to avoid driving him into the arms of Hitler, were referenced in some responses. Stronger responses were better balanced, with explanations on each side, in this case providing alternative reasons for the League's failure in the 1930s. These usually included explanations of the impact of the Depression or the problems limited membership created when the imposition of sanctions was considered. The very best responses went on to substantiate a judgement on the hypothesis given in the question.

Question 6

Relevant points in part (a) included the lack of action by Britain and France plus additional points of detail, such as Britain's view that Germany had a right to do what it wanted in 'its own backyard'. The opposition of French public opinion and the economic and political crises faced by its government were also cited. Candidates knew a great deal about the failures of the League of Nations in the 1930s in part (b) but needed to apply this knowledge to why these failures were important to Hitler. In this case, the League's failures were important to Hitler because they showed him that the League would not stand up to countries which had aggressive foreign policies. This was clear when Japan got away with invading Manchuria and the incapacity to deal with Italy's aggression in Abyssinia. When Hitler decided to destroy the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, he was more confident that the League would not stop him. Many valid factors were identified in answers to part (c) and candidates attempted arguments to both support and challenge the idea that they may be surprised by Germany's invasion of Poland in 1939. Some explanations dealt precisely with the Polish context. For example, some responses expressed surprise because both Britain and France realised that Hitler wanted to conquer the whole of eastern Europe and he was not going to stop at Czechoslovakia. This was explained by reference to Polish guarantees that if it was attacked they would come to its aid. Answers explained that appeasement had therefore ended and as Hitler did not want a war with Britain, the invasion of Poland was a significant risk. Candidates who went on to provide a balanced answer in which other arguments were explained provided the best responses. These answers included a 'lack of surprise' because of the well-publicised aims of Hitler's foreign policy (such as lebensraum), as they applied to Poland. The terms of the Nazi-Soviet Pact were also used as a signal of Hitler's intent. Some then progressed to an evaluative conclusion, rather than repeating points already made.

Question 7

There were some good answers to part (a); many responses included the military nature of the alliance, its purpose to stand up to communism and how its members used it for mutual protection. The best answers to part (b) kept precisely to the demands of the question which focused on why the fate of Germany at the end of the Second World War led to disagreements, rather than general differences such as those based on ideology. Identified factors referenced the issue of reparations, the West's preference for a strong Germany to counter Soviet influence and Truman's hostile attitude to Stalin. Candidates who then explained each factor fully achieved the strongest responses. The aim in part (c) was to write a balanced answer which looked at the motives behind the Marshall Plan. Responses tended to emphasise and explain efforts by the United States to combat the advance of communism in poverty stricken and war-torn European states. Some responses offered more, explaining that the idea behind lending European countries enormous sums of money was that, as their economies recovered, they would buy goods from the USA. This would help US industry and create jobs in the USA because there would be a great demand for US exports.

Section B: Depth Studies

Question 9

It was rare to read a poor answer to part (a), as candidates gained marks by describing such features as disease, trench foot, mud, wet and damp conditions, rats, shell shock and boredom. There were detailed narratives of the use of tanks in part (b), although the best answers met the specific demands of the question with explanations of importance. Weaker answers tended to make generalised observations about tanks and trench warfare. Two explained points about importance or impact were provided in the best responses, for instance, the impact of tanks at the Battle of Cambrai in 1917 and the co-ordinated counterattacks of 1918. Answers to part (c) reflected many details about the battles of Verdun and the Somme but were less clear about their comparative importance. An analysis of their relative impacts might have included the argument that Verdun was crucial as the loss of the fortress would have been catastrophic, while the Somme played its part in taking pressure off Verdun and it also enabled valuable lessons to be learned about how to develop military strategies to fight attritional warfare.

Question 10

There were too few responses to this question for meaningful comments to be made.

Question 11

Candidates in part (a) were able to describe numerous events in 1932 and 1933 which led to Hitler becoming Chancellor. The best responses focused on elections and the roles of Hindenburg, Papen and Schleicher. It is worth noting the importance of dates –some answers included events after January 1933. Answers to part (b) contained detailed knowledge about the reasons why the Nazis failed to win support during the so-called ‘Golden Age’ of the Weimar Republic, emphasising why economic ‘recovery’ lessened the appeal of extremist parties. Part (c) saw candidates writing at length about the Reichstag Fire and Night of the Long Knives and in better responses candidates were able to link their narratives to the demands of the question. In other responses, these links could have been made more explicitly; in this case, the quality of the answers relied on a discussion of ‘importance’. Some candidates would have benefited from greater engagement with the idea of analysing impact, placing both events in the context of the development of a one-party state, the destruction of the opposition to the Nazis and Hitler’s assumption of dictatorial powers.

Question 12

It was rare to see weak answers to this question. Candidates knew a great deal about the Nuremberg rallies in part (a). Part (b) provided an opportunity to explain why some young people rebelled against the Hitler Youth. Weaker responses relied on general criticisms of Nazi indoctrination, discipline and activities aimed at preparation for either life in the military for boys or in the home for girls. Higher marks were achieved when candidates explained the specific objections of groups such as the Edelweiss Pirates or those who might consider themselves members of the Swing Movement. In part (c), many candidates went beyond description to explanation and tried to create an argument; for example, they contrasted the fear engendered by the Gestapo with the effectiveness of Nazi propaganda in considering why the Nazis managed to stay in power. Developed attempts to interlink the two factors reflected a complex understanding of the topic.

Question 13

In part (a) some candidates took the opportunity to focus precisely on consequences of the Russo-Japanese War and achieved good answers; for example, responses focused on Bloody Sunday, criticism of the Tsar’s authority and the loss of military prestige. Responses to part (b) saw candidates take a short and long term view of the significance of Bloody Sunday; there were explained references to the loss of trust in the Tsar, leading initially to the 1905 Revolution and subsequently to the October Manifesto. Many answers to part (c) reflected strong lines of argument expressing surprise that the Tsar survived as long as he did until 1917 on the one hand, with lack of surprise at his maintenance in power because of his use of both reform and repression after 1905. Explanations were supported by knowledge of the royal family’s unpopularity following the failed Dumas, The Fundamental Laws and the disastrous entry into the First World War to support ‘surprise’; alternative factors such as Stolypin’s reforms and the Okhrana’s brutality evidenced lack of surprise.

Question 14

There were too few responses to this question for meaningful comments to be made.

Question 15

Candidates knew many of the products promoted by advertising in the USA in the 1920s in part (a). Better answers focused on cars and examples of domestic appliances. Part (b) attracted many quality explanations of the failure of Prohibition which often focused on a lack of public support, the problems of enforcement, corruption and the widespread supply of illegal alcohol. Part (c) responses tended to be unbalanced and descriptive; the elements of ‘similarity’ and ‘difference’ were not always made clear. The best answers drew on knowledge of poverty and discrimination in both urban and rural areas (similarities), and evidence of the 'boom' enjoyed by urban Americans, rather than those in rural parts of the country (differences). Developed arguments tended to be stronger when explaining the latter.

Paper 2147/22
Paper 22

Key messages

Candidates should ensure that they answer the question directly. If a question asks how useful a source is, candidates should clearly refer to 'usefulness' in the answer; if a question asks why a speech was given or a letter was written, then explaining a reason is vital. The best way to ensure that the question is being directly addressed is to refer to it in the opening sentence of the answer, for example 'This cartoon is very useful to a historian because'.

Avoiding descriptions of pictorial sources and paraphrasing written sources is important. Candidates should try to interpret sources. This means they need to work out the argument or point of view the artist/author was trying to put across and their purpose in doing this. It can be a useful starting point for candidates to ask themselves about each source, 'What is the point of view of the artist or author?'

Question 6 carries a high number of marks. When answering it, candidates need to directly check each source against the hypothesis given in the question and not against something that is similar to it. In the twentieth century option, a number of candidates focused on 'harsh' rather than on 'unfair'.

General comments

A large majority of candidates answered the questions on the twentieth-century option. There were many competent scripts and a small number of outstandingly good ones.

Nearly all candidates were able to comprehend the sources and showed at least reasonable skills in interpreting, comparing and evaluating. The better candidates made good use of their knowledge and understanding of the historical content to help them understand and use the sources relevantly. Weaker responses tended to focus on the historical context without relating it to the question or the sources.

Nearly all candidates completed all the questions, although there was a tendency to write very long answers to Question 1. These answers often contained lengthy paraphrases of both sources and did not address the question until right at the end. This sometimes appeared to lead to candidates not having enough time to complete Question 6 properly.

Comments on specific questions

Option A: Nineteenth century topic

Question 1

Most candidates managed to find several agreements such as the Papacy, Austria and local loyalties all being an obstacle to unification. Many also explained that the sources disagree over what was the biggest obstacle to unification, the Italians or Austria. Some candidates summarised both sources and then made assertions about agreements or disagreements. The best way to answer this question was a point-by-point comparison.

Question 2

The most common way of answering this question was to focus on the fact that Charles Albert promised his immediate support in Source C, but in Source D he claimed that he was not ready and was very slow to act. Candidates used this difference as proof that Charles Albert was lying in Source C. Some also compared his show of enthusiasm for 'Italian brotherhood' in C with his rejection of popular support in D, and the suggestion that he was more interested in expanding Piedmont's power. Better answers evaluated one of the sources to check whether these differences meant he was lying. The most popular way of doing this was to consider Charles Albert's purpose in making the proclamation in Source C. Relevant use of sound contextual knowledge made this approach work well and produced some very strong responses. Other answers tended not to compare the sources or identified lying by Charles Albert but did not explain the lying.

Question 3

The key to answering this question well was to consider Mazzini's message in the context of November 1848. By this time it is not surprising to see Mazzini feeling frustrated because of the defeat of Charles Albert and the change of mind by Pope Pius and King Ferdinand. Most candidates were able to explain Mazzini's message but tended to set this in the very general context of 1848, rather than specific events of that year. A small number of candidates paraphrased the source, rather than interpreted its message.

Question 4

Most candidates were able to find similarities in the messages of the two cartoons. Similarities most commonly explained were the fact that Italy is not free in either cartoon and the fact that Austria is portrayed as an oppressor in both. A few candidates managed to find a difference such as Source F suggesting some possible hope for Italy, but Source G suggesting no hope at all. The best answers were those that compared the points of view of the cartoonists – they are both in favour of a free independent Italy.

Question 5

There are two crucial steps on the way to writing a good answer to this question. The first is to infer from Source H the Pope's attitude towards a unified Italy. The second is to clearly and explicitly address the issue of 'surprise'. Some candidates wrote good answers that could have led to being surprised or not surprised but did not get as far as addressing the issue. Most candidates were surprised by what we are told about the Pope's attitude in Source H. This was based on Pius's actions as a reformer shortly after being elected as Pope in 1846. A few candidates were able to use their knowledge of the Pope's actions and pronouncements since 1848 to argue that there is no reason to be surprised by Pius's attitude.

Question 6

This question was generally answered well. The sources provided candidates with plenty of material to work with on both sides of the argument. They managed to focus on the hypothesis about Austria being the most important obstacle to Italian unification and used the sources clearly and convincingly. The following is a good example of how a source should be used in response to Question 6: 'Source D shows that the most important obstacle to Italian unification was the incompetence of Charles Albert. The source tells us that he was very slow in attacking the Austrians and his army was not ready. It also suggests that he was interested in increasing the power of Piedmont rather than helping Italian unification.' A few candidates neglected the sources and wrote general essays about the struggle for Italian unification.

Option B: Twentieth century topic

Question 1

Most candidates had little difficulty identifying and explaining agreements between the two sources, for example they both state that the British thought the Treaty was too harsh, they both state that Germany did not like the Treaty, and they both claim that Germany was made stronger by the Treaty. Candidates found it harder to find disagreements but they are there, for example Source A claims Germany was made stronger by the splintering of the Austrian and Russian empires, while Source B says that this was caused by the creation of Poland. Candidates should avoid summarising each source and then asserting that they agree or disagree. What worked best was a point-by-point comparison.

Question 2

The majority of candidates were split into four groups by this question. Some thought that the cartoonist approved of the treatment of Germany, and this seems to be supported by the mocking way in which the Kaiser and Germany are presented. The date of the cartoon would also support this view. In June 1919, a large majority of people in Britain wanted Germany to be punished harshly. Those that were explicit about the cartoonist's approval provided the strongest responses. A second group of candidates understood that Germany was being punished harshly but did not get as far as suggesting approval. A third group inferred valid sub-messages from the cartoon, for example the Treaty was a diktat, Germany did not like the Treaty or the Allies were in total control. A final group of candidates, probably influenced by Sources A and B, understood the harsh treatment of Germany but argued that the cartoonist disapproved of what was happening. These answers were the weakest ones to this question. A small number of candidates either misinterpreted the cartoon (for example Germany was being punished lightly) or described the surface features of the cartoon.

Question 3

There were few poor answers to this question. Most candidates addressed the issue of surprise and did so by comparing the claims made by the two sources. This usually led them to conclude that Source D does make Source E surprising because of the disagreements about the Treaty. However, some then turned their answers around by pointing out that because D is British and E is German, the disagreements are not surprising. The best answers developed this approach further by using either contextual knowledge or cross-reference to other sources to explain why the views expressed in Sources D and E are to be expected. Less successful answers either claimed that D does not make E surprising because one is British and the other is German, without using the content of the sources, or did not address the issue of surprise.

Question 4

This question is about Lloyd George's purpose in making the speech in Source F when he did. The best answers therefore focused on what he said and how he wanted to affect the behaviour of others. This led them to explain that Lloyd George was trying to win the support of Parliament or of the British people. Many candidates put their answers in context by explaining, for example, that he may have been doing this because of the demands in Britain for a tough treaty. A careful reading of Source F shows that Lloyd George was trying to convince people that the Treaty was a good one because it was just, its punishment of Germany was appropriate, and that it would help maintain peace in the future. Many candidates just focused on the message of the speech and did not consider Lloyd George's purpose in making such a speech, while some explained the context as the reason for giving the speech but neglected to address what he was actually saying. The best answers brought message and context together, to explain Lloyd George's purpose. It is very important, when answering a question such as this one, that candidates make clear that what they are explaining about the message or the context, is a reason for the speech. A few candidates explained message or content but would have improved their answers by stating why they were doing this.

Question 5

This question produced many good answers. Most candidates argued that the cartoon is useful evidence. They did this on the basis of interpreting the messages of the cartoon, for example, Germany was punished harshly. Better answers added that Germany's allies were also going to be heavily punished. This is a central feature of the cartoon. The cartoon also reveals the cartoonist's glee that the punishment was going to be harsh. The cartoon has a gloating tone and some candidates were able to use this as evidence of British support for the treatment of Germany and its allies. Weaker answers dismissed the cartoon as not useful because it is just a cartoon, it is British and therefore biased, or because of what it does not tell us. When responding to questions about usefulness it is usually a good approach to try to find a way that the source is useful. This cartoon is undoubtedly biased, but this is not a good reason for rejecting it because it provides useful evidence about British attitudes. Some candidates argued that the cartoonist is criticising the peace treaties, whereas the portrayal of the various figures in the cartoon clearly suggest a mocking of the fear and discomfort of Germany and its allies.

Question 6

Many candidates answered this question well. They were able to explain how some sources support the hypothesis that Germany was treated unfairly, and how some sources disagree with such a claim. The best answers contained certain key features. First, it was made clear which source was being referred to and whether it supports or disagrees with the hypothesis. This can be achieved very simply, for example 'Source

E supports the idea that German was treated unfairly because...'. Second, the focus was on the hypothesis, rather than on a variant of it. For example, it is not acceptable to replace 'unfairly' with 'harshly'. They do not have the same meaning. Something can be harsh without being unfair. Thirdly, if sources were divided into two groups, each individual source was then used by itself. Attempts to make general claims about a group of sources do not generally result in strong answers. Finally, source detail was used as the basis of an explanation of how a source supports or disagrees with the hypothesis, for example 'Source E supports the idea that Germany was treated unfairly. It does this by calling the treaty 'disgraceful' and claiming that German honour was being 'dragged to the grave', and 'Source F does not support the claim that Germany was treated unfairly. This is because Lloyd George argues that the treaty was right and fair. He does this by arguing that Germany has to pay reparations because of the damage it caused in the war. It is being punished because it tried to trample on national rights and freedoms.'

HISTORY

Paper 2147/23
Paper 23

Key messages

- Candidates should read through the background information and the sources before answering any of the questions. This should give them an understanding of the main issue of the paper and of a range of perspectives. This understanding will feed into all of their answers, as well as helping to identify opportunities for cross-referencing.
- It is crucial that candidates respond to the specific question being asked. For example, answers on the twentieth century topic that did not address a reason for publication in Question 2, the issue of surprise in Question 3, or usefulness in Question 4 struggled to achieve high marks. A helpful strategy is for candidates to directly address the question in the very first sentence of the answer, for example, 'Source B was published at this time because' or Source C does/does not make Source D surprising because'.
- On Question 6 candidates must ensure that the specific hypothesis stated in the question is being addressed and that sources are used as the basis of the answer. Candidates should engage with the content of the sources and make it clear whether they are using a source to agree or disagree with the given statement. It is crucial that candidates use the sources to both support and challenge the given hypothesis.
- If quotations from the sources are used, and this can be particularly useful when answering Question 6, candidates should not use an abbreviated form of quotation that misses out some of the words and replaces them with ellipsis points. The words that are used must make sense and support the point the candidate wants to make, so giving the quotation in full is crucial.

General comments

Most candidates responded well to the demands of the paper and the overall standard of answers was broadly in line with previous series. An overwhelming majority of the scripts were on the twentieth-century option, consequently there were too few responses on the nineteenth-century option for meaningful comments to be made. Most candidates completed all 6 questions, however there were a few instances of rubric errors where candidates attempted both the 19th and 20th century options, such scripts did not tend to score highly.

Comments on specific questions

Option A: Nineteenth century topic

There were too few responses for any meaningful comments to be made.

Option B

Option B: Twentieth century topic

Question 1

This question asked candidates to explain the impression of Clemenceau presented in Source A. Many candidates were able to identify an impression, such as Clemenceau was misunderstood, open-minded, reasonable or rational, and then use information from the source to support this. In the vast majority of instances, if a valid impression was identified, support was then given, often in the form of a direct quote from the source. The strongest responses were from those who could support more than one valid impression. In less successful responses, some candidates paraphrased the source and made no inferences. One issue with the use of Source A is that the author comments on the views of others. It is important that candidates distinguish between the presented opinions; for example, the source says that 'Clemenceau was personally responsible for the damage the Treaty did to the ideals of Wilson', however this is not the author's view, rather this was a popular idea that was, in the author's view, wrong. Neglecting to make this distinction hindered some attempts to present a valid impression.

Question 2

This question produced a wide range of responses, but most candidates were able to demonstrate at least some understanding of the cartoon 'The Reckoning'. The best answers focused on the purpose of publication in the context of the time. The context being that the Treaty of Versailles had yet to be signed, but negotiations were well underway and the purpose being to justify the reparations bill to the British or get the British to support it. What was crucial was that candidates recognised that the cartoon is about reparations specifically. Answers that referred in more general terms to the Treaty were rewarded as sub-messages. Many candidates produced reasonable answers by focusing on sub-messages, for example, that the Germans were unhappy about reparations or that they complained about the Treaty, but these fell short of explaining the cartoonist's overall message. Here there were a couple of routes that candidates could pursue, one being that the reparations were fair and the other that Germany was being unreasonable in complaining about the reparations. Less successful candidates wrote surface descriptions of the cartoon or offered valid interpretations of it without considering reasons for its publication in 1919. Some responses were based on a misinterpretation of the cartoon. These candidates had not made use of the provenance given and wrongly concluded that the cartoonist's message is that the reparations were too high or the Treaty's terms too harsh.

Question 3

In Question 3, candidates were asked to consider two written sources and conclude whether the content of one makes the other surprising. Specifically, they were asked whether Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau's response to the proposed terms of the Treaty of Versailles in Source C makes Source D, Clemenceau's reply to the objections he raised, surprising. Many candidates were able to pick out agreements, or more commonly, disagreements between the two sources and use these to explain their surprise or lack of surprise. Agreements between the sources include that Germany must pay reparations, while the disagreements focus on the nature of the Treaty and its impact on Germany. In Source C, the Treaty is not just or it is unfair, while in Source D, it is fair or just. In Source C, the terms are more than Germany can bear and economic life is made impossible, while in Source D, there is no intention to strangle Germany and it will be treated fairly economically. The best responses were from candidates that could make a valid comparison between the sources and then explain a reason for the agreement or disagreement based on an evaluation of the sources. The surprise, or lack of surprise, expressed had to make sense in the light of the specific explanation presented. The most commonly used contextual evaluation centred on Clemenceau's aims and the experiences of the French in the war. It is worth noting that there was a small but significant number of responses in which the issue of surprise was not referred to at all; such responses were not addressing the question. A helpful strategy with a question about surprise is for candidates to directly address the issue in their opening sentence.

Question 4

This question, which focused on the usefulness of Source E to a historian studying the Treaty of Versailles, produced a wide range of answers. In many responses, candidates dismissed this source as not useful simply because 'it is a British source and therefore biased'. Some candidates were able to identify a valid sub-message from the source, for example, that the Treaty was not harsh enough or that Germany did not receive the punishment it deserved, but then still concluded that the source has no use due to its bias. It is worth remembering that most sources can be useful in some way and that the bias of a source is often precisely what gives it its usefulness. The best answers demonstrated an understanding that the source tells us a lot about British attitudes towards the Treaty of Versailles and that the source is useful as evidence that British opinion wanted the Treaty to be harsher.

Question 5

This question produced many strong responses. When candidates are asked about the message of a source they should always try to consider the author's voice or opinion. Many recognised the need to address the cartoonist's view in this question and consequently produced strong responses by explaining that, in Source F, the cartoonist is disapproving of the harsh treatment of Germany in the Treaty of Versailles. The support from the source for this conclusion was wide ranging; many referred to sub-messages, such as the Treaty was a diktat, the Treaty was harsh, the Germans will suffer as a result of the Treaty, or identified the overall message, that being that Clemenceau wanted to punish Germany harshly. There was little misinterpretation seen in responses to this question and, with very few exceptions, candidates were able to move beyond a surface description of the source and explain one or more of the cartoon's numerous sub-messages.

Question 6

There was a wide range of answers to this question. Some candidates achieved high marks by carefully explaining how some of the sources (B, C, D and F) can be seen as providing convincing evidence that Germany was punished as much as the French wanted, while others (A, B and E) argue that Germany's punishment was not sufficient to satisfy the French. The most successful answers examined the sources one by one and explained how the content of each supports or disagrees with the given hypothesis. Other candidates did not make it clear whether the source under discussion was being used to support or challenge the given statement or used a slightly different hypothesis - for example, simply referring to the Treaty of Versailles as being harsh or not harsh. A helpful strategy is to begin an answer to Question 6 by stating which sources support and which reject the given statement; candidates should use the words from the question to do this. They should then continue by writing about the sources in order, or by addressing those that support the statement before moving on to deal with those that reject it. What is crucial is that clear explanations about how the content of a source provides evidence to either support or dispute the hypothesis are given. Many candidates used direct quotes from the sources to do this. For this to work well, however, as mentioned above, a full quote must be used. Few genuine examples of the evaluation of the sources were seen. Most candidates did not attempt evaluation, but those that did were successful when they examined the purpose of the writer or cartoonist, as opposed to evaluation based on source type, undeveloped provenance or evaluation unrelated to the hypothesis.
