Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From V D Cha, Powerplay: The Origins of the American Alliance System in Asia, published in 2016.

Before the June 1950 invasion, there was agreement amongst US foreign policy officials that South Korea was no longer of importance. Korea was merely a geographical add-on to the Asian continent and of no importance in the US grand strategy in Asia. The last US armed military unit had already departed from South Korea, leaving only a 500-man advisory group. 5

And yet the North Korean invasion was such a blatant act of aggression, Truman felt compelled to respond. The best explanation for why the United States changed its own policy by going into Korea had less to do with the threat posed by the invasion to the strategic situation in Asia and more to do with US status in the world order. Truman was outraged and angered by the nature of the attack. It was an all-out armoured invasion against a weak US partner state. He reportedly told his Secretary of State on the day of the attack that he would stop the communists at all costs. Policymakers were concerned that Korea was just a diversionary tactic. They feared it was actually being used to advance communist interests in the most important areas of the cold war – Europe and the Middle East – on the other side of the world. They were concerned that it was really being used by the communists to test America’s determination to defend its spheres of influence. 10 15

Having seemed unimportant, Korea now mattered. The Truman administration could no longer separate US prestige in the world from defending remote Korea. 20

Extract 2: From M Schaller, Douglas MacArthur: The Far Eastern General, published in 1989.

Truman, and Acheson, his Secretary of State, knew, even if they did not say so, that party politics in the United States had to be taken into consideration in any decision made about Korea. For months, Republican critics, including the strongly anti-communist Senator McCarthy, had accused Truman of not standing up to Asian communism and abandoning China to the communists. 25
A leading Republican working within the Truman administration warned that 'to sit by while South Korea is overrun by unprovoked armed attack would start a disastrous chain of events leading most probably to world war.'

Truman and Acheson may have hoped that by standing up to communist aggression in Korea they could keep control of events. Also, they may have hoped that they would be able to prevent further pressure to take direct action against China being placed upon them. Both men were reluctant to admit that party politics in the US motivated the decision to become involved in the Korean crisis. As a result, Truman and Acheson portrayed the Korean crisis as part of a global challenge directed from the Soviet Union against the American spheres of influence. 30
